Long ago the wounds of war were healed, and while no such evidences are needed to show that this is a reunited country, these occasions afford an opportunity for the people of the two sections to get better acquainted and to appreciate the virtues and the excellences of each other. Many of our troubles and dissensions in the past have been due to misunderstandings, and when the people of the North come to know the South, and the people of the South come to know the North, there will be greater respect, higher regard and more earnest and sincere co-operation. For we are all one people, citizens of a common country, with common interests and a common destiny.—Baltimore Sun.

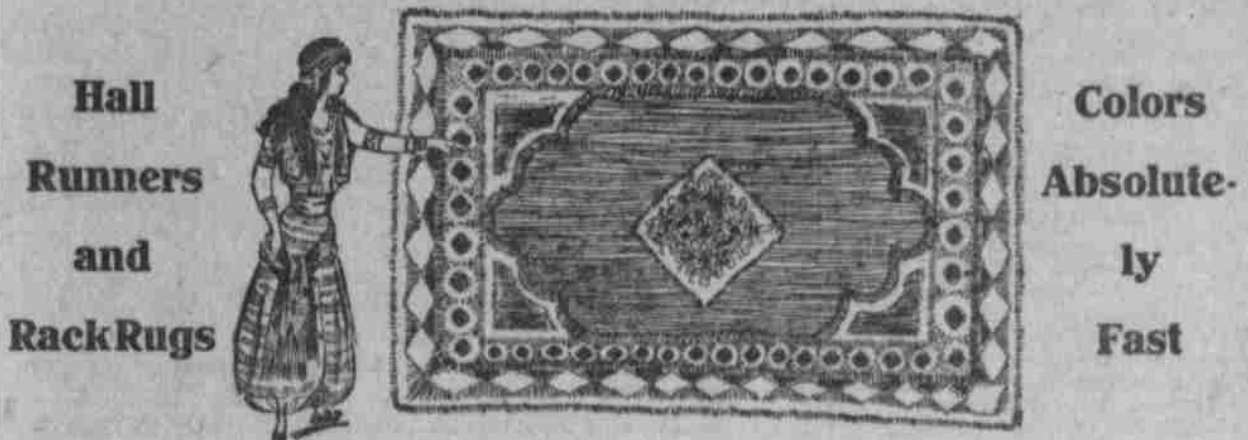

And The Wounds of War Are Healed.

The Northern states' whose sons fought for the Union in the War between the states are doing the Virginia battle fields with monuments to preserve the memory of their valor. New Jersey yesterday dedicated two monuments to the Fifteenth New Jersey Volunteers, who took part in the desperate fighting around Fredericksburg. One stands where the battle of the Bloody Angle was fought, at Spotsylvania, and the other at old Salem Church.

Governor Fort and the survivors of the Fifteenth went down from New Jersey to dedicate the monuments, and they were given the most cordial reception by the Virginians, who made the event an occasion of reunion and fraternity. The old Confederates and their descendants received their former foes with the warmest hospitality. They tendered them receptions, musicales, luncheons, and joined with them in honoring the memory of their brave sons who fell in battle.
